Lord Brassey's long letter in the Times on The Fleet as Seen at Spithend" contains. smong others, two points of particular interest. The first is his remark that our oldest irenclads -the Black Prince and the five masters, for instance-will, if fitted with modern engines, make very efficient ships, since their system of armour is rather better adapted than more recent ones to resist quick-firing guns and melinite shells: It would seem that the vehament critics who wished to be rid at once of our obsolete tin-kettles were in somewhat of a burry. The other interesting point in Lord Brassey's letter is his repetition of the old complaint that our versels of low freeboard will be the less useful in war because they will not be habitable in rough westher-since they will be all awash and the men will have to be shut down below till they grow sick and languid. What a pity it is that the scientific people cannot make cast-iron automatic sailors! And what a pity that the scientific mind generally is so incapable of understanding that a machine will, in the long run, be just as efficient as the men who work it and no more!

Mr. Grant Allen has been struck with the pregnant educational value of the tropics. If we really desire to understand the history of life, we must go to the tropics; for it is that part of our changeful planet which most nearly preserves its To study things properly we must break away from this cramped cold north ern world and bring ourselves face to face with the truths of simple naked nature in Pacific isles. or African forests. Our present views of life are formed in regions which have been starved and impoverished by the great Ice Enoch: the student should train bimself in the wider, richer. and more varied world to be found in the tropical latitudes. Even a young lady's education could best be finished; Mr. Grant Allen thinks, in the tropics, where the refractive influence of views formed exclusively in the North would be corrected by "a certain genial and telerant virile expansion" not to be a quired in Europe. These suggestions are expounded at length in Longman's Magazine; but, efter all, the writer admits that his plan is beset with sidence he mislikes the tropics; and so would most of his readers.
